Extended Abstract

Introduction

The Israeli regime's attacks on Gaza in 2023 raise important questions about international criminal law. This study looks at whether the ICC has the authority to prosecute crimes related to these attacks.

Research Gap and Objective

Since Palestine's part of the Rome Statute, but Israel isn't, the big question is: Can the ICC actually do anything about alleged crimes in Gaza?

Methodology

This study looks at the Rome Statute and the Court's past decisions by analyzing the 2023–2025 attacks.

Key Findings

The International Criminal Court has been dealing with crimes in Palestine since June 2014. Palestine's joining, plus the referrals in 2023 and 2024, and the arrest warrants for Netanyahu and Gallant, back this up.

Contribution to the Field

By integrating legal theory and judicial practice, this article provides a new angle for the evaluation of the ICC's jurisdiction.

Implications and Applications

This study's results could help the Court be more influential and guide global groups when they make criminal justice policies.

Conclusion

Even with some problems, the ICC can judge war crimes by Israel in the 2023–2025 attacks. That's a move in the right direction for global justice.
